

Eat your art out

Since 2009, Sydney art historian Megan Fizell has mashed her interests in food and art for the delectable blog, Feasting On Art. Fizell's blog serves a platter of direct reproductions of famous canvases rendered in edible ingredients – including a terrifyingly deconstructed, pound cake version of Piet Mondrian's "Composition No 8" – as well as recipes triggered off by other works of art, such as one for lemon poppy seed bread and blueberry honey butter, inspired by Vincent van Gogh's 1890 "Still Life: Red Poppies and Daisies". Each of the entries is accompanied by nuggets of information about the original artwork.

Fizell however, is not the only artist-gourmand around. At Time Out, where the same respect is accorded to gastronomic exploration as aesthetic appreciation, we sunk our teeth into masterpieces closer home. The tasteful representations in the pages that follow are intended as tribute and testament to some of the artists we love. With contemporary and modern works from young and old masters, abstractionists and figurative artists, we've attempted to cook up a cover story we hope you will truly relish – and if these whet your appetite to embark on a culinary art adventure of your own; don't forget to tweet us a picture of it at @timeoutblr. Styled by Nitin Tandon. Photography by Mihir Hardikar. Text by Karanjeet Kaur.

(This page) Styled by Pramod Jadhav. Photography by Tejal Pandey.

